

Indiana Knows the Rules

Indiana doesn't just play by the rules — we live by them.

From the hardwood courts of our small towns to the halls of our courthouses, our heritage is built on fair play, hard work, and honesty. The rhythm of a basketball bouncing on a gym floor isn't just a sound — it's a lesson. Discipline, respect, and accountability make victory possible. Without rules, there is no game. Without integrity, there is no government worth trusting.

In Indiana, we know this truth deep in our bones. You don't win by cutting corners. You don't claim glory by cheating the clock. And you sure don't serve the people by hiding the playbook.

Across our communities, hardworking Hoosiers rise before dawn, put in honest days, and expect the same from those who represent them. The heart of our government must beat in time with theirs — service, transparency, integrity. Not as empty slogans, but as sacred duties.

Money is part of the political process, yes. Campaigns cost resources. But those dollars aren't handouts — they're investments of trust. When a Hoosier, a business, or a Political Action Committee gives to a candidate, they're placing faith in that person's honor. And when that trust is violated, it's not just a clerical error — it's a crack in the foundation of our democracy.

That's why transparency isn't optional — it's essential. Every dollar given, every dollar spent must be accounted for. Indiana law demands it, and the conscience of every honest citizen should too. When a candidate lists a PAC contribution that can't be found in the PAC's own filing, the siren goes off: where's the accountability?

Because here in Indiana, we don't tolerate double-dribbling on the court — and we won't tolerate double-dealing in public office.

Over sixty donations don't match. Sixty! That's not a small mistake — that's a scoreboard flashing "foul." The people deserve answers, and they deserve them now.

This isn't about partisanship; it's about principle. It's not left or right — it's right or wrong. Indiana's soul is steeped in fairness. We don't accuse for sport; we hold accountable for honor. We don't demand transparency to embarrass; we demand it to preserve trust.

The rules matter — because without them, everything collapses. Indiana knows that. Always has. Always will.
